It is astonishing how cunningly and quickly rats will run along the hawser of a ship attached to another ship in order to search for more abundant food than they could procure in the ship they have just left. This is generally done in the night, but the migration has been witnessed in the day time. When rats have devoured all the food in a barn, they will migrate in considerable numbers to another. A friend of mine, a clergyman, witnessed one of these migrations, and saw an old blind rat holding a short bit of stick in his mouth, and another rat holding the other end; in this way the blind rat was conducted safely along. This anemote may be doubted, but I have too high an oninion of the veracity of my respectable informant to doubt it myself. The contrivances of rats to procure food are some-times very extraordinary. They have been known to insert their tails into an oil flask, and then lick off the adhering oil till the flask was emptied, or, at least, till their tails would reach the oil no HANA BLANTATION. longer.
